Tarpon Club Collection
Florida State University
by Hannah Wiatt Davis, Heritage Protocol & University Archives Archival Assistant

The FSU Tarpon Club Collection, 1931-1994 documents the history of FSU’s longest running club through official records, correspondence, photographs, scrapbooks, performance programs, and films. The Life Saving Corps began holding exhibitions in the Montgomery Gym indoor pool demonstrating aquatic skills during the 1930s. These exhibitions featured form swimming, figure swimming, speed swimming, lifesaving techniques, diving, and canoe handling. The Tarpon Club began during the early 1920s as the Florida State College for Women (FSCW) Life Saving Corps. In the spring of 1937, members of the Corps under the direction of Betty Washburn formed the Tarpon Club, choosing the tarpon fish as its mascot due to its reputation of being an acrobat of Florida waters. The club presented its first “water pageant” in the fall of that year featuring swimming stroke demonstrations and floating patterns performed with musical accompaniment. The Club continued to perform at least one production per year, with each show containing a central theme, until its disbandment in 1994.

Rollins Archivist Publishes on Chinese Immigration in the South

Professor and Olin Library Archivist Wenxian Zhang recently published the essay “Chinese in Florida: History, Struggles and Contributions to the Sunshine State,” which appears as a chapter in Far East, Down South: Asians in the American South.

The book, which is edited by Rayond A. Mohl, John E. Van Sant, and Chizuru Saeki, is a collection of essays that restores and explores Asian immigration in the South—an often-overlooked part of the South’s story. By adding a new dimension to the popular understanding of southern history, the book seeks to document the historic presence of Asians in the region since the mid-19th century, the sources of numerous waves of contemporary Asian immigration, and the steady spread of Asians out from the coastal port cities to other parts of the American South.
The Legend of José Luis Avellanal
Gil Gott, Plant City Photo Archives and History Center

One day a woman donated several old items she was discarding from her years of collecting from antique shops to the Plant City Photo Archives and History Center. The day was June 1st. Among the items was a diploma in an old battered frame. After removing and cleaning the diploma, we could read that it was issued by the High School of Hillsborough County to José Luis Avellanal y Jimenez, dated June 1, 1922.

Oddly, after that day, peculiar things began to happen around the office, including computer glitches and part of the ceiling falling in. Who was this José Luis Avellanal? We learned from Andrew Huse, archivist at USF Special Collections, who informed us that USF had a large collection of materials on the Avellanal family, and Tampa Tribune reporter Paul Guzzo, that José Luis was the son of Dr. José Ramon Avellanal. And that José Luis had a strange and mystical history.

Dr. Avellanal was born in Spain and educated in the Spanish colony of Cuba, where his family owned a sugar cane farm leased to sharecroppers. He later spent a year in Costa Rica fighting a yellow fever epidemic then moved to Ybor City in 1904 to serve as a doctor for its growing immigrant community. José Ramon Avellanal became medical director of the new Centro Español Hospital on Bayshore Boulevard, and in 1911, he established the El Bien Publico medical center, attracting a patient membership of over 20,000 by the time he passed away in 1927 (Special Collections records). Dr. Avellanal also owned a cigar factory, a public welfare company, and drugstores.

José Luis Avellanal, however, wanted people to believe he could talk to the dead, even raise them up. He claimed to be a gynecologist and plastic surgeon, yet it is unclear whether he was properly trained in either field. He strutted around Tampa wearing a Mexican lieutenant’s uniform, though he may never have served a day in that country’s armed forces. Historians often label Avellanal’s real life exploits as some of Tampa’s most fascinating true stories.

José Luis Avellanal died in 1982 at age 78, and legend has it that his ghost haunts Ybor City along with the spirits of women he is said to have slain in his quest to learn how to revive the deceased. And each Halloween season brings a revamped version of Avellanal’s life, one that links him with murder to fit the ghoulish holiday. This version has been told so often it is repeated by many as fact. We don’t know about that, but we were glad to donate the original diploma to Andy Huse and the USF Special Collections section and get José Luis out of our office. It has been wonderfully normal since then.

Thanks to Andrew Huse, USF Special Collections, and Paul Guzzo, Tampa Tribune, for most of the information in this article, and TBO.com for the image of José Luis.

2016 Award of Excellence and Lifetime Achievement Award

This year’s Award of Excellence was presented posthumously to Sister Dorothy Neuhofner, O.S.B., Ph. D. Sister Dorothy, as she was known, dedicated herself to lifelong learning and to the library and archival professions. Celebrating 50 years at Saint Leo University, from 1965 – 2015, she held many positions within the Daniel J. Cannon Memorial Library at the university, including her latest role as University Archivist and Special Collections Librarian. Additionally, she began library instruction classes, planned a library expansion project, and actively served various professional organizations.

Sister Dorothy, a member of the Benedictine Sisters of Florida, was serving as the archivist for the Holy Name Monastery. She earned her Master’s in Library Science at Rosary College (now Dominican University) and Ph. D. in Library Science from Florida State University. In addition, she earned a Master’s in Church Administration from Catholic University of America. She turned her dissertation into the book In the Benedictine Tradition: The Origins and Early Development of Two College Libraries, published in 1999. Sister Dorothy passed away on October 14, 2015.

(CETA), an outgrowth of President Johnson’s War on Poverty that began in 1964.

I worked at the Nassau County Museum and Reference Library in Eisenhower park, under the direction of Nassau County historian and author Richard A. Winch and Librarian Mary Louise Matera. My work consisted of creating typed inventories of 17th-19th Century deeds, wills, and other business and personal papers of Long Island residents during those periods. Some of the oldest and most fascinating records, particularly for eastern Long Island, documented land sales and various business transactions between representatives of the Shinnecock and Montauk tribes and land settlers.

My most fulfilling time was spent for the Curator of Anthropology Ronald Wyatt at the Graves Point Museum and Preserve in Glen Cove. At that time, environmental impact studies were being conducted by the Nassau County Department of Public Works, and the reports that were generated from those studies were a new requirement to ensure the preservation of significant historical and archaeological sites. My specific responsibility was to conduct historical research in as many archival repositories in the New York City area as possible that would provide for evidence of former Indian settlements that could be protected from future development.

After I completed my projects at the Nassau County Department of Parks, Recreation, and Museums, I worked at several public libraries and finally found my niche as a certified archivist at Florida State University. My experience in the CETA program nearly 40 years ago lit the spark that launched my career as an archivist.

Researching Long Island History During the CETA Program: How I Became an Archivist
by Burt Altman

During the mid 1970s when I lived in Long Island, I was employed for about two years by the Nassau County Department of Parks, Recreation, and Museums through the Federal Comprehensive Employment Training Act

A Lifetime Achievement Award was presented to Burt Altman in recognition of his longtime service to the Society of Florida Archivists. Burt had previously written a piece on getting his start as an archivist for the Suffolk County Archaeological Association Newsletter, a portion of which will appears below.

Rare books are not archival, but many of us have an exhibit component to our job duties. This semester I was tasked with curating an exhibit of rare texts and manuscripts. Florida Southern College’s Roux Library is a small library, and while we have been in business since 1883, that business has not been to collect heavily in the book arts. In July of 2015 we were approached to hold an exhibit of rare books and manuscripts held by The Remnant Trust, Inc.

The Remnant Trust is a “public educational foundation that shares ... works dealing with the topics of individual liberty and human dignity ... (with) colleges, universities and other organizations for use by students, faculty, scholars and the general public. Those exposed are encouraged to touch, feel and read the originals, including first English translations.”

The provost was enthusiastic about the offer to host an exhibit. Library and Archives personnel were excited to delve into the curation and exhibit of these special collection materials. We were soon sending book lists to campus faculty to see if they wanted to participate in a lecture series. Nine professors signed up to participate and chose 35 titles to talk about and incorporate in their semester classes.

After looking at the list, I added another dozen books (we finally received 49 titles or 63 volumes) to round out a theme of “The History of the Book.” The prime pieces I chose to display were a Sumerian Foundation Cone (c. 2500 BCE), a leaf from a handwritten document by Thomas Aquinas (dated 1447), and a leaf from the Gutenberg Bible (dated 1455) to illustrate to students what forms of printed materials existed before typed texts and e-books.

The lecture series wrapped up November 9, and the books will be returned to the Remnant Trust on December 9. I believe the exhibit has been a success. I have honed my exhibit skills, taught some interesting classes, hosted colleagues and Library school graduate students, and generally had fun seeing people’s eyes light up when they get to hold and read a book or page from a rare manuscript that might be older than anything else they have ever seen in their lifetime.

More information and photos from the exhibit can be viewed at http://libguides.flsouthern.edu/RemnantTrust.
Lone Arrangers as Team Players
Diane Newman, Florida Institute of Technology

This is an excerpt from a paper presented at the SFASG meeting.

This year’s conference topic “Defining Archives” focuses on a myriad of new roles facing archivists today. University expectations of collection development are a direct response to living in the digital world. Large heavily endowed libraries benefit from having skilled archivists to accomplish specific tasks. A smaller archive like the one I curate at Florida Tech depends upon a lone arranger for Special Collections, and yet, my duties require training outside traditional archive responsibilities.

This paper intends to present innovative methods I used to multiply my efforts by reaching out to experts for their support. I will relay personal experiences to demonstrate practical ways to build robust archives. I hope my story proves a lone arranger with a strong backup team can win the game.

The first team I want to talk about is the one I created inside my office at Florida Tech. Each semester, I requested about five Federal Work Study and College Roll students. These student workers multiplied my efforts. Florida Tech students are not only bright, but they work hard. It takes many hours to digitize and create metadata. They edited audio-visual recordings, created spreadsheets, wrote computer code and organized files. They helped me produce brochures, presentation materials, exhibits, and more. I may have been the official lone arranger, but I was surrounded by effective team players.

Before I became an archivist at Florida Tech, the Instructional Technology (IT) department videotaped a series with the Chair of Humanities interviewing the school’s pioneers. Recorded with two cameras, each interview required editing the raw footage into a polished program. I requested assistance from our Instructional Technology department. A Federal Work Study student used IT editing equipment under IT supervision. In addition to synthesizing the individual interviews, we needed to add an introduction, titling, credits and music. The IT team put together a collage of relevant photographs for the series introduction. The student added titling and end credits. Best of all, we received permission to use music for the intro and credits from a CD recording of the Florida Tech faculty band. I am proud to say the Florida Tech Pioneer Series 1 is now online.

I end by summarizing my approach to dealing with the challenges many archivists face today: You are not alone. Take advantage of experts around you. Ask for their help in a way they won’t want to refuse you. Use your imagination. Put yourself in your team-member’s place. To paraphrase the poet Robert Frost, men work together whether they work together or apart.
